Not illustrated. 1920 edition. Excerpt: ...fashion which was quite devoid of poetry. It was not long before the youth repeated the offense and the irate sire prepared to keep his word. The avenging rod was about to descend when young Isaac fell upon his knees and supplicated his father thus: Dear father, on me mercy take, And I will no more verses make! The old gentleman was completely nonplussed, but decided to let the boy follow the bent of his own genius. Isaac Wattss sermons would put a modern congregation to sleep in ten minutes, but his glorious hymns will live in the hearts of Christian people as long as the church shall stand. The boy Michael Angelo, turning with equal disgust from the tasks of the schoolroom and the sports of the playground, to copy with marvelous skill and accuracy the drawings of great artists, then and there foreshadowed the coming master whose touch made canvas speak and dull, cold marble thrill with life and beauty. The boy Napoleon Bonaparte, studying the lives and campaigns of famous soldiers and then storming the snow forts of his companions at the military school of Brienne, was the unfailing prophecy of the victor of Marengo and Austerlitz, the tread of whose conquering legions caused kings and emperors to tremble on their thrones. Now, talent is not always thus early developed. Nevertheless, every one of us has been endowed with some special and original power which fits him for a life of usefulness and honor, though not necessarily of popular renown. It is the duty that every man owes not only to himself but to God and the world to find out this talent and properly develop it. Too many people are attracted in their selection of a lifework by the glamour of place and title. They are victims of that delusion, so false and...
