Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: ...to perfection indoors and of flourishing in the shade better than in the sun. In the strictly green room, as a rule, only foliage plants look well unless one excepts the creamy white flowers of narcissus or cosmos. Just what to do with the shaft windows in an apartment is something of a puzzle. Of course, they can be treated exactly like ordinary windows,--though at the expense of needed light and air--and in any case the dead white of the ground glass panes seems to require some softening. Moreover, they are generally at an unusual height from the floor, and the common draperies look a trifle incongruous. When the window swings on a central pivot or opens outward, casement fashion, the best thing to do is to fit the windows with straight, rather full, curtains of some material heavy enough to be used with wooden curtain rings, which swing more freely than metal ones, supported on a bracketed pole. Denim, chintz or flowered silkoline lined with plain colored cheesecloth, or the English casement flax are, any of them, good for the purpose. Then below the window on a level with the sill fasten a shelf painted or stained like the woodwork and holding a jardiniere and plant. Choose some plant whose outlines are good so that it will stand out against the ground glass panes. It can be moved to one side when the window is open, and the effect is excellent. With a casement window a valance at the top of the curtains is an improvement. If it is possible to place a cushioned seat with pillows, in the material of the curtains, below the window, so much the better. » It is surprising what may be done by the home decorator by an artistic use of simple, every day things. For instance, a single branch of the deep pink cherry blossoms you can find in any Japanese stor...
