

The Life and Teachings of Keshub Chunder Sen (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Life and Teachings of Keshub Chunder Sen It is impossible for me to realize that Keshub Chunder Sen has ceased to live. Impenetrable to this aching eye of flesh, the veil behind which his glorious face is hidden is a semi-transparent veil, penetrable to the faithful spirit that longs to be united with him night and day. So vivid and intense is the image of his presence somewhere very near, in the bosom of that Infinite Father, communion with whom is my daily rest, that every unsatisfied aspiration, shared with him, makes its appeal to Keshub, every sorrow, such as he suffered, seeks his silent sympathy, every trial, such as he bore, waits for strength and endurance upon his glowing example. His influences suffuse this luminous atmosphere of thought, goodness, worship, wisdom. The abounding spirituality of the Church of modern Hindu Theism is fragrant with the incense of his pure profound life. I have sometimes seen thousands of our Indian roses, beaded by the morning dew, light up long-stretching fields in the gloom before day-break. But scarcely did the first sun-gleam glance on the fairy scene, when lo every rose had disappeared, gathered and hidden away in the folds of the reapers robes. Yet though the flowers had changed places, their sweet aroma scented sky and land, till the next mornings roses appeared again, adding beauty to beauty, and sweetness to sweetness.
